

The Prism Project tries to address the inequity issues in Silicon Valley by proposing a brand-new type of structure expanding above the river, that differentiates from the traditional light tower. Operating as a bridge from past to present to future, the tower offers multiple layers of views, and is easy to access from the public landscape. It serves as a confluence hub for people, regardless of age, discipline, and professional status, who come here and interact. People act as a ray of white light that travels through the Prism at an angle and comes out as a spectrum.